Opening up Government is a trend worldwide. Yet, Governments have to be clear about their objectives and tailor the data to be opened to achieve desired outcomes. Open Data has the potential to be a “game changer” in global efforts to accelerate innovation, improve quality, fairness and accessibility of public services, as well as to strengthen Government transparency and accountability. At the same time, Governments use the internet and social media to connect with Citizens, while these use online platforms and new technologies to make their voices heard and participate in public affairs. Social media can engage a wider public in discussions about politic policies and can enable public participation in service design and delivery. This session aims to take stock women-led innovative practices to use open data and social media to promote open and responsive Governments.
